

Nothing come easily

Written by Marco Tusa

Sunday, 11 March 2012 00:44 - Last Updated Sunday, 18 August 2013 16:39

I had several discussions recently, with several friends and a colleague, about what is really relevant, what is important, where to put our best efforts and so on.

I am convinced that there is not a single answer but as many as people on earth, never the less, there is something that I consider a golden rule.

Nothing that has value comes easy. If you think to achieve good result, permanent one (as permanent life can be) without effort, then you are wrong.

That includes the kind of people finding themselves in good position/shape just because someone else put them there, you will fell and not have the capacity to rise again.

Anyhow, I was thinking on how to organize my next learning path, and what courses I should attend to achieve what I would like to be next ... when I found this image.

